OUR HISTORY

“Pot bunkers are ‘wee beasties’ that are far deeper than they are wide. The only thing you must do if you get in one is to get out of it.”

–From an article about sandtraps in The Independent

Wait, don't go! Instead, settle into our wee beastie of a bar. A pot bunker (found on a golf course and not tucked beneath a restaurant and hotel, that is) is a small, deep hole with steep walls, commonly found on links courses like this one. Depending on strategy, a pot bunker can be a “greenside guardian or a fairway menace.” Perhaps the most infamous bunkers are found at Scotland's Old St. Andrews Course (est. 1552) – the 10-ft-deep “Hell Bunker” and the “Road Bunker.” Innumerable golfers have seen their dreams put to rest there.

But here at our Pot Bunker, no need to worry about dying dreams or fairway menaces. During cooler, rainier times, our fireplace crackles companionably, drying out the soggy togs of hardy golfers having finished up the course. And in sunnier times, when everyone else is outside, the Pot Bunker is the ideal spot to hide away from the world with a pint and a book.

Kids are welcome, just like in cozy, Irish pubs that are gathering spots for the entire community. So hand the wee ones our copy of Harry Potter to read over a round of Arnold Palmers while you peruse Golf in the Kingdom with a whiskey on the rocks.
