PUB HISTORY

From the late 1800s, Roseburg was a busy point on Southern Pacific's main rail line between the Pacific Northwest and Northern California. In 1912, the city replaced the former wooden depot with this impressive Arts & Crafts-style building, called one of the finest passenger stations between Portland and the Bay Area. It's fun to imagine what it was like back then – finely-dressed crowds awaiting the massive locomotives' arrival, porters handling luggage, train engineers striding importantly through. Locals remember selling apples to passengers – and, during Prohibition, some recall stashing bootlegged bottles of whiskey beneath the fruit, sold at a tidy profit. Today, no stashing required – order up a whiskey or a beer while you enjoy the historic depot's atmosphere.
